Literary Theory and Criticism:

While this grouping should not be considered as a category in the same sense as those above, the following should be minimally required in addition to those included in the various historical periods.

1. Aristotle: Poetics.
2. Wellek and Warren: Theory of Literature, 3rd ed.; 1956, Chapters 2, 3, 12, through 17.
3. Cleanth Brooks: “The Formalist Critics” From The Kenyon Review, XIII (Winter 1951), 72-81; “Irony as a Principle of Structure” from Literary Opinion in America (M.D. Zobel, ed.) and Critical Theory Since Plato (H. Adams, ed.).
4. Herbert Read: “Psychoanalysis & Criticism” from Twentieth-Century Criticism (Handy and Westbrook, etc.).
5. Northrop Frye: “The Archetypes of Literature” from Fables of Identity.
6. Martin Esslin: “The Significance of the Absurd” from The Theater of the Absurd.
7. Wimsatt and Brooks: Literary Criticism: A Short History. Chapters 7, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 18 through 21, and 26.

8. Dahlstrom: Strindberg's Dramatic Expressionism. Chapters on the general characteristics of Expressionism.
9. A Grammar of Literary Criticism (L.S. Hall, ed.) Chapters on Surrealism.
10. Sartre: "Why Write?" from What is Literature?

Reading List. The influence of a skilled and thoughtful mentor never wanes. Edward Hundert.Â I learned about his reading elective from a fellow student as we were waiting for a conference to begin. Les was coming to interview a patient from whom none of the residents or students could get even a basic history: the womanâ€™s experience was completely filled with terrifying hallucinations.
