David Stevens is the Royal Australian Navy's historian. He holds a doctorate in naval history from the University of New South Wales, spent twenty years as a naval warfare officer and still serves as an officer in the active reserve.

In All Respects Ready presents the most comprehensive and authoritative account of the Australian Navy's involvement in World War I yet published.

When the newly built Australian fleet sailed into Sydney for the first time in October 1913, it was portrayed as a sign of peace that came from being prepared for war. Within a year that war had broken out and the Royal Australian Navy, fully trained and ready, was the most professional and effective force Australia had to offer the British Empire. Throughout the next four years of conflict Australian ships and sailors would operate across the seas and oceans of the world, establishing a tradition of intrepid courage and dogged endurance while forging their own unique naval and national identity.

Impeccably researched, and drawing on a wealth of previously untapped official reports, intelligence summaries and private diaries, this book offers far more than a chronicle of historical fact. Crafting the definitive work on this largely ignored chapter of Australian history, the author presents an engaging narrative of the war at sea that brings to life both the human element and a richly depicted sense of place.

- First detailed account of Australia's role in the Great War at sea since the 1920s
- A history of high scholarly quality written for a general audience
- Makes use of archives and diaries from around the world
- Generously illustrated with specially drawn figures & maps, including previously unpublished photographs
- Provides Australians with a valuable reminder of their part in the global naval war 1914-1918
